Telling the Story with Maps: Maps of Early Illinois and Where to Find Them

On Thursday 12 November Ginger Frere of Information Diggers discussed a variety of types of maps with advice on where to find them. While her presentation focused on Illinois mapping, it would be easy to use Ms. Frere's suggestions to finding maps of other locales. The maps she showcased, and the collections they were in, are freely available online.

Maps have been used to convey all types of information from: topography, migration routes, boundaries, politics and more. The level of sophistication of maps has also evolved. An early map of the Missouri River created in 1703 by Lahontan shows a vast geographic area, laid out with a different perspective. She showcased the much later map of "The Conflagration in Chicago" which included lithographs of the devastation of the Chicago Fire of 1871 and listings of buildings destroyed.

Maps are held by a number of types of libraries, online and in print format. Locally the Newberry Library has a collection of over 600,000 maps. An online resource you should check out is the ATLAS OF HISTORICAL COUNTY BOUNDARIES. Here you can select a state and county and observe the change in county lines through time. This affects WHERE you should look for ancestral vital records.

Merry Christmas

David Rumsey has made available a collection of over 91,000 maps dating from the 16th century for FREE.

Larger libraries will have map collections. Check out their websites/library catalogs to see what their holdings may be. University libraries also collect maps, often making digital copies a priority. The University of Chicago and University of Illinois at Urbana were mentioned. (This author worked at a state university in Michigan and often provided reference assistance in our map collection.)

The Illinois State Library has a digital platform called IDA/Illinois Digital Archive, that ALL types of libraries throughout Illinois contribute digital content to.

From stagecoach routes and tavern listings, to county lines to highway routes, maps are filled with information that can help you flesh out the story of your ancestors' journey. They can also help you locate places that no longer exist.

Take a look at Ms. Frere's syllabus on our website (mcigs.org) for a listing of all the websites mentioned.

ANCESTRY

One positive thing coming out of the pandemic, is that Ancestry has allowed access to their library version to everyone from home. You need a library card from your local library, but many are arranging that online. If you don't have a card, obtain one and then access Ancestry.

Ancestry has now extended the end date once again, allowing for access until 31 March 2021.

Happy hunting!
